The Roanoke City School last night was put in the position of defending its choice of electric heat for three new schools. (Show that fillum)

School Board Chairman J. P. Cruickshank says actually installation costs are far less for electric heat and overall heating costs will be less than using other types of heating equipment. Cruickshank claims there'll be an overall savings of about 18,000 dollars if electric heat is used. The head of the board told Council members that fuel oil costs at the new Lincoln Terrace Elementary School have been far greater than anticipated. Speaking of school construction, Cruickshank said only 600 thousand of the 8-million-dollar school bond issue has been spent so far, but spending will be greatly ~~speeded~~ <sup>speeded</sup> up from now on.
